[授業の概要・目的]

Social sciences, which aim to achieve an in-depth understanding of human behavior, share with the natural and engineering sciences a common scientific framework, while also employing their own specific and diverse research methodologies. These methodologies are typically divided into quantitative and qualitative approaches.
This lecture focuses on qualitative approaches. We will explore how research is conducted - from formulating a sound research question to writing the final research report - and examine how several well-known studies have generated knowledge about human behavior.

[到達目標]

This course aims to familiarize students with various qualitative research methods, helping them develop a critical perspective and the ability to analyze social, economic, and political issues as presented and debated in the media. Students will also gain the skills necessary to conduct their own qualitative research. A wide variety of studies will be examined and discussed, alongside the construction of qualitative research projects and the challenges associated with each stage of the research process.
